"Why do we read so much about 'bleeders' these days? Is there something happening to the health of the horses, and what factor does heredity play in the 'bleeder' problem."

"One of the reasons we are finding more bleeders these days is because of improvement in the examination procedure," notes Dr. Alex Harthill, prominent Midwestern veterinarian. "The development of fibre optic equipment enables us to look inside a horse as we never could in the past. Some years ago, when a horse coughed, or if he hung during his stretch run, we might have suspected he was a bleeder but we weren't certain.

"Another reason we are finding more bleeders," Dr. Harthill said, "is year-round racing. In the old days, horses were given long holidays and had a chance to recuperate from the rigors of competition. Life is more stressful for horses these days, and that is part of the problem. Incidentally, 99 percent of all bleeding is from the lungs.

"Is hereditary a factor? In the sense that it relates to dispostion, which is often passed on, I feel it is somewhat a factor. There is another aspect of the bleeding problem, too, and that is environment. I'm alluding to the quality of the air. There are certain areas of the country which are just not as favorable to horses as others. It's a complex problem and medication is not always the entire answer."

"I've recently read several references to the term 'cribbing.' What exactly is this?"

"A horse who clings to an object, such as a stall door, with his teeth and sucks air into his lungs is known as a cribber," says Dr. William O. Reed, prominent veterinarian and breeder. "This practice can cause colic. It can also be a source of nervous irritation. Instead of eating, the horse is sucking air, and his regularity is upset. Horsemen in Europe dislike cribbers intensely. However, good horses can be cribbers. Kelso was a cribber, and an unusual case at that. Most cribbers begin the practice as yearlings, but Kelso didn't become a cribber until he was 4 or 5. The cribbing strap, which encircles the neck and prevents contraction of muscles in that area, is one preventative measure in wide use."
