"I have been a racing fan for many years and have never seen as much inconsistency and reversal of form as is presently the case. What is responsible for it?"

"There has always been inconsistency of form in racing, and probably always will," says Keene Daingerfield of Kentucky, one of America's most respected racing officials. "Much of the racing in this country involves cheap claiming horses. The reason these horses are cheap is that they have no consistency of form. They are affected by the slightest incident in a race, whereas a good horse often overcomes trouble en route and his form is more consistent. Another point to remember is that it is the public that selects the favorite, and 66 per cent of those favorites, on the national average, do not win. Some, of course, are false favorites. They should not be favored but are perceived by the public as the logical choice to win. Inconsistency can be reduced by vigilant and knowledgable officiating. Most officials are trying to do the best job possible."

Explanation of Track Variant

This takes into consideration all of the races run on a particular day and could reflect either the quality of the competition, how many points below par the track happened to be or both. The speed rating of each winner is added together, then an average is taken based on the number of races run. This average is deducted from the track par of 100 and the difference is the track variant (example: average speed ratings of winners involved is 86; par is 100; the Track Variant is 14). When there is a change in the track condition during the course of a program the following procedure is employed in compiling the variant: Races run on dirt tracks classified as fast, frozen or good, and those listed as hard, firm or good on the turf, are used in striking one average. Strips classified as slow, sloppy, muddy or heavy on the dirt, or yielding and soft on the turf, are grouped for another average.

If all the races on a program are run in either one of the other of these general classifications only one average is used.

The lower the variant the faster the track or the better overall the quality of competition.
